There are various types of housing in Britain. These range from the traditional thatched cottages to modern blocks of flats in the cities.

Houses are often described by the period they were built in, for example, Georgian, Victorian, 1930's or post-war.

They are also described by the type of house they are. A terraced house is a house joined to another house.

A semi-detached house is two houses joined together.

A detached house is a house which has no houses attached to it.

British houses are also described by the number of bedrooms they have, e.g. 3 or 4 bedrooms.

British houses are usually built of brick.

Semi-detached houses are usually in the suburbs, which are near the town centre.

Most British people love gardens, and this is one reason why so many people prefer to live in houses rather than flats.

British people love their homes and consider their home to be their castle.
