Families in the past and now

When one looks back, they see that the image of a family has greatly changed over the centuries. In the past families used to be quite big – sometimes with ten children or even more. Extended families tried to settle close to one another and often several generations lived under one roof. Now relatives are often scattered around the world and people tend to start a family later than they used to, so, as a result, families nowadays have fewer children. Members of an extended family may have family get-togethers only on special occasions – like Christmas or Easter or Thanksgiving in America. This is sad because modern families lack unity and communication and mutual understanding and they don't pay as much attention to one another and they probably should.
